It is important to store these kits out of direct sunlight and away from strong smells. We have found the vials to be very stable, even when exposed to magnets, airport screenings etc. (We would though not encourage you to bring them as a carry on as it might be difficult to explain to the TSA why you have a vial marked with the name of a deadly microbe). Even so, we recommend that they are stored away from magnets and other high emf exposures as an extra precaution. Some practitioners use magnets in their testing procedures, and this has not caused any problem with the vials.

There are no problems about storing different kits in the same box, although you might want to organise them in a particular way for other reasons, e.g. it is fine to store bacteria vials and foods in the same box, although you might want to store all your foods together for logical reasons.

Some people seem concerned about bacteria, parasite and similar vials in some way 'contaminating' other vials, because such vials have a 'bad' energy. This concern is completely unnecessary, and, in fact, labeling test kit vials as containing 'bad' or 'good' energies does not stand up to any scrutiny at all. Perhaps more importantly, viewing vials as 'bad' can lead you subconsciously to be nervous of using these vials, thus depriving clients of the most efficient way to help them.

Remember, these vials cannot be used to state a diagnosis. They can assist you in your evaluation with clients and in setting up a treatment plan. You should never, though, say a person has a particular microbe or toxin based solely on a vial test. The energy of these vials should not be viewed as 'good' or 'bad', but merely as 'appropriate' or 'inappropriate' at this time for this person.
